22. Vehicular air pollution control has become a keenly - felt need today. It involves the control of the harmful gases produced by cars, buses and lorries. Since automobile air pollution is quite serious in many of our cities, a concrete programme should be evolved to reduce these emissions. The discharge of pollutants, particularly the offensive black smoke, can only be attributed to inefficient engine performance. Improvement of engine performance will also lead to better fuel economy.

If we look at diesel alone, we find that it accounts for nearly 30 percent of India's total consumption of petroleum products. It results in a corresponding quantity of pollution. The main consumer of diesel is road transport. Control of vehicular pollution should be based on methods that are in keeping with sound operational economics. Fairly simple and in expensive methods are available to achieve the desired ends.
